

ABSTRACT

The invention relates to a novel protease, called SENP1, which is active against sentrin-modified proteins in vivo. The invention more specifically relates to the genomic and amino acid sequences for SENP1, compositions related to and based on these sequences, and methods of using these sequences and compositions.

5